As we all know, 1 out of 3 citizens in Hong Kong would be 60 or above. To keep the productivity and competitiveness of Hong Kong, we must not import mainland workers continually in the long run. To eradicate the problem, I reckon we must raise the local birth rate. We still have 30 years to solve the problem and it's never too late to encourage bringing up children. To be concrete, the government could provide a bigger tax discount to local parents. The more children they have, the larger the tax-cut. The government could also subsidize the educational expense of those parents. What's more, it's also important to promote the idea of giving birth. For example, promoting that children would be the strongest and safest aging insurance and having children would enrich your life. Raising the birth rate could generate many working places in Hong Kong, which helps the problem of unemployment.
