In order for Hong Kong to uphold their economical status and sustain economical growth, Hong Kong must have an equally balanced population, and think for the future. Although the effect of the existing pro natalist policies can not be quantified as it is difficult to control the publics reaction, I feel that there is no harm in giving the public more incentive to reproduce. The typical Hong Kong citizen takes his/her work very seriously, and barely have enough time for themselves. If the Hong Kong government can generate policies that are beneficial to citizens in a financial and social aspect, the results may be more significant and noticeable.
