I feel like more stringent measures should be taken to increase the amount of births in Hong Kong. Although there already are plans and approaches in place for there to be changes, these are not direct enough. Hong Kong should take other countries such as Singapore and force through changes. The consultation document currently has a pretty small scope and only looks at Hong Kong on it's own, but should also consider attracting foreigners to aid in adding to the workforce because there will be a large demographic crisis in the near future with a low amount of people supporting the dependent percentage of the population. More money should be injected into maternity facilities and benefits instead of giving general benefits to the entire population to make babies a more appealing image for couples.
