To help ease the labour shortage, especially in the area of low-skilled jobs, I think the government should follow the advice of the HK University teacher who proposed giving temporary work visas to some of the thousands of asylum seekers in HK, many of whom have been in HK a number of years and speak Cantonese as well as English ...making their assimilation in the work force easier than people from other places who don't speak Cantonese.

The asylum seekers also already have homes in HK ...which saves the need to arrange transport and homes for people from outside.

Temporary work visas could be like those given to outside workers who were brought to HK for the construction of the new airport

Adopting the above proposal would also cut down on the crime rate in HK, since not a few frustrated and below-the-poverty-line asylum seekers get involved in activities like illegal work, theft, fraud, drugs etc in order to get money for their families
