I think the government should establish a long term strategy on our population policy. Hong Kong is a small international city. It is not reasonable to accept unlimited increase in the number of population as our resources are limited. So it is more reasonable to set up a reasonable population range that can be afford by Hong Kong. Personally, I have some conservative on introducing foregin workers or specialist as it may result in over-reliance on foreign workers and specialists in the long run. Some industries like construction should offer some incentives to attract the labour to join their industries insteading of just introducing foreign workers so that the industry with excess labour supply can release the workforce to those with labour shortage. This can help to strike a balance in the overall labour workforce in Hong Kong. Besides, the government should offer incentives to encourage Hong Kong people to give birth to a baby like tax reduction. It can help to generate ! production power in the long run and reduce the over-reliance on foreign labour. This can ensure Hong Kong can generate the workforce internally and continuously. Nowsday the youngsters in Hong Kong do not willing to have a children. It was mainly due to the unstable political environment with certain restriction on freedom together with housing problem (Difficult to buy a house or rent a house) and education problem (many changes in several years which is difficult for teachers and students to adapt). In conclusion, the governement should set up a long term population policy instead of just introducing short term policy to resolve the current issues/ problems. This should be considered together with the housing policy, education policy and child policy as they are inter-related.
