In terms of long term economic growth, absolutely more manpower will be better.

But we must address the more urgent problems, the current issue in Hong Kong.

The territory is over-populated where HK resources is not enough to cater its population anymore. (HK people has no life they just struggling for survival everyday.) They struggle to get into the MTR, struggle to get into the escalator, struggle to get into the lift, I cannot enjoy why walk in anywhere during my weekend due to overcrowded. Struggle to get a place in school. Struggle to buy a can of milk. (You name it, you need to struggle for everything.) Not to mention, not enough flats to shelter its people. All I can see at present is HK people become rude, desperate and unease. They will put up a fist fight for sit in MTR or fight for a walkway. (Barbaric act never seen in HK before). In short, I can see HK as a developed place crowed by uncivilized people. (nothing different with China, crowded place with people brutally struggling for limited resources in the city).

Instead of importing more migrants for FUTURE economic growth. Shouldn't the government consider solving the CURRENT problem first.

They should slow the migrant (this is a policy change no discrimination implied), create more resources (housing and infrastructure) for its people first. Let Hong Kong people have their life back first. Bring back HK people culture as has disappeared already.

Solve today's problem first better talking about tomorrow.
