I think the government should be more active in terms of promoting child birth. I just give birth to my first son, and the expenditure has increased dramatically.

In order to encourage child birth, the government should give money incentive or at least give a tax refund for the current tax year immediately. Second, there are not enough child care facilities in HK, any nursery (those taking care of young child) are always full and very costly.

I would very much like to continue to work after my maternity leave, but the current situation really put me into doubt if I could still having a full time job.

As a master graduate, I would really like to contribute to the society and continue to work. Also, I know the government has encouraged 3 children for each family; however with such lack of support (both financially and practically), it is very difficult to have even one child for a working couple. Here, your current (lack of supports) policy basically takes away one current workforce and potentially some future working power. I would appreciate if something could be done in the near future.
